Marie Curie (or Maria Skłodowska-Curie, born as Maria Skłodowska; November 7, 1867 – July 4, 1934) was a physicist and chemist. She was born in Warsaw and spent her early years there, but in 1891, she moved to Paris where she obtained all her higher degrees and conducted her scientific career. She was the first woman appointed to teach at the Sorbonne. Despite enormous family suffering, Marie and her sister Bronia rose above poverty and entered professions normally reserved for men. She then pursued her scientific work at great personal and family sacrifice. She intentionally did not patent the radium isolation process, so that other scientists would not be hindered in researching the radioactive material.
