in Perspectives on Global Development and Technology. Author: Violet Bridget Lunga. View More View Less.Â This paper discusses hybridity as a strategy of survival for those caught between the languages of their colonization and their indigenous languages and also illustrates how, through hybridization, postcolonial subjects use colonial languages without privileging colonial languages. Drawing on Bakhtinian notions of hybridization, this paper shows colonial and indigenous languages contesting each other's authority, challenging and unmasking the hegemony of English and to some extent Shona. Ndebele and Shona are indigenous languages spoken in Zimbabwe, Africa.

The desire is to speak of ourselves, asking those whom listen to feel for us with kind empathy and respect. As in tribal traditions we as ceremonial apprentices strive to gain knowledge from a learned entity. We approach the elder and ask for this same type of understanding. The elder shall only respond once a like respect and compassion is engendered toward them, an offering must be made. Global capitalism and cultural standardisation also open up the risk of a "flattening of differences" or an "equalization of cultures" (Hutnyk 95-96). In Hybrid Cultures: Strategies for Entering and Leaving Modernity (1995), Néstor García Canclini had already argued: When hybridization is the mixing of elements from many diverse societies whose peoples are seen as sets of potential consumers of a global product, the process that in music is called equalization tends to be applied to the differences between cultures. (47). Hybridity therefore has to defend its ground as an active, dynamic process. Colonial Desire. Hybridity in Theory, Culture and Race. London and New York: Routledge. Spaces of identity. Or might they potentially expand and enrich it? To what. 3. Spaces of identity. extent do these areas seek to develop better relations with Europe? To what extent are they being pulled towards alternative points of reference? What range of identities might be possible within the European "cultural space"?
