If you want to make sure you are not plagiarizing the answer, you may want to run it through <http://www.duplichecker.com/> . As you move forward in your education this is a valuable resource. There are others out there, but this is the one I used with my research proposal for my Masters and it never let me down. If you do need to use information you found online or in print, please cite (I'm not asking for a formal citation) where you found it. You might say... I found this on Wikipedia (keep in mind the info on this site is posted by everyday folks like you and me for the most part so it may not be as accurate as you hoped for). You might even say we discussed this in another one of my classes and Mr. X said.....

Correction agencies are distinguished from other typical agencies in that people do not willingly come to prisons as they are forcibly brought through the gates with a view of preventing them from leaving by correctional officers, fences, and walls (Marion and Oliver, 2006, p. 402). The inmates are required to live according to the dictates of correctional administrators while inside the prison, a situation that make the job of correctional officers dangerous and risky as they have to constantly confront these dangerous inmates on a daily basis (p.402). The American jail: Cornerstone of modern corrections.
