Leavis' conception of criticism is very different from the contemporary understanding of the term. To Leavis, the purpose of evaluating literature is to keep alive the tradition of the human world, not by admiring its achievements, but by bringing its values, purpose, and significance to bear on the presents. So, it is the business of the critic to explore and rediscover the social culture and an art of living behind literature. Leavis was a controversial critic. He was frequently impelled for what was in fact his greatest strength: his consistent refusal to define a clear theoretical basis for his work. As a literary critic he felt little sympathy for the others. Picture of 18th century social life in Addison's The Coverly Papers. Joseph Addison is regarded as one of the masters of English prose.

The account of a life in criticism is sympathetic and resolute but its sobriety sometimes detracts from the clarity. In the first place the biographer, perhaps out of extreme scrupulousness, fails to account for the relation between personal antipathy and opinion and action which seems to be so crucial in accounting for both the actions and attitudes of Leavis himself and those of his enemies. FR Leavis seems to have been very shoddily treated by Cambridge over the years.
