Quantum mechanics is the science of the very small. It explains the behavior of matter and its interactions with energy on the scale of atoms and subatomic particles. By contrast, classical physics explains matter and energy only on a scale familiar to human experience, including the behavior of astronomical bodies such as the Moon. Classical physics is still used in much of modern science and technology. However, towards the end of the 19th century, scientists discovered phenomena in both the large Waves and particles are independent paradigms of classical physics: a particle is not a wave and a wave is not a particle. As suggested by Phillips (2003), "the laws of particle motion account for the material world around us and the laws of electromagnetic fields account for the light waves which illuminate this world". A result well-known from the studies initiated by Gustav Kirchhoff in 1859, is that the intensity of electromagnetic radiation emitted by a perfect absorber (black body) is a universal function of the temperature T and of the frequency of radiation ν . In practice, the black-body radiation is the radiation from a small hole in an isothermal cavity. The challenge is to reconcile the concept of wave (a non-localized object) with that of particle (a localized object).
