Hull claimed that international law requires "prompt, adequate and effective" compensation for the expropriation of foreign investments. Developing countries supported the Calvo doctrine during the 1960s and 1970s as reflected in major United Nations General Assembly resolutions. The Iran-US Claims Tribunal recognised in the Amoco case that Iran owed compensation for expropriatory measures, and also acknowledged the rule of non-discrimination. The Award specifically states that: "discrimination is widely prohibited by customary international law in the field of expropriation," although the Tribunal found no discrimination in this case. Amoco see op. cit. n. 6. 11. Dolzer and Stevens op. cit. n.5 at 99. States have a sovereign right under international law to take property held by nationals or aliens through nationalization or expropriation for economic, political, social or other reasons. In order to be lawful, the exercise of this sovereign right requires, under international law, that the following conditions be met. In the first part of the twentieth century, the first major phase of mass expropriations (nationalizations) occurred during revolutionary movements in Russia and Mexico. A second wave of nationalizations and expropriations followed the period of decolonization that took place after the Second World War. UNCTAD Series on International Investment Agreements II.
