Here's a field guide to some land birds commonly seen by visitors: Galapagos Finches. There are 13 different species of finches found on the different islands in the archipelago, and naturalists believe they all descended from a common ancestor that somehow found its way to the islands ages ago. Some look so similar that it takes a trained eye to tell them apart while others look so different it is difficult to believe they are the same species. The Galapagos finches will forever be associated with Charles Darwin, the great nineteenth-century naturalist who used them to illustrate his Theory of Evolution. Ages ago, a single finch species made its way to the Galapagos. Today, there are thirteen different species of finch spread out over the islands, each of which has adapted to its specific environment. This is a list of birds recorded in the Galapagos islands of Ecuador, where 185 species have been documented as of February 2019. Of them, 30 are endemic, three nest only in the Galapagos, and virtually the entire population of a fourth nests there. Seventeen endemic subspecies are noted. In addition, 85 of the species are accidental, five were introduced to the islands, and five are domesticated.
