European football has always been a powerful melting pot, and migrants have played a major role in spreading the game to five continents. National teams, which in the late 19th century were probably meant to symbolise the triumph of the nation-state over the dynastic empires, rapidly became a reflection of socially, linguistically, culturally and ethnically diverse national societies. Diversity in football is everywhere to be found, and we only need to look at photographs and captions of football teams from last century to notice how waves of migration have made European local and national cul
