A cross-staff. This one is a modern reproduction in the style popular with Dutch navigators in the eighteenth century. The next step in the evolution of celestial navigation instruments was the cross-staff, a device resembling a Christian cross. Interestingly, its operating principle was the same as that of the kamal. The vertical piece, the transom or limb, slides along the staff so that the star can be sighted over the upper edge of the transom while the horizon is aligned with the bottom edge. The Persian mathematician Avicenna wrote about a cross-staff in the eleventh century.
