Furthermore, even when considering the same dataset, there is not necessarily one unique best solution: for example, clustering proteins either into homologs, families or super families are all relevant tasks; nevertheless, the clusterings will be hugely different from each other despite being based on the same dataset. ... Data can generally be present in two different forms [3]: One-mode data comprises of a  $n \times n$  data matrix describing the inter-object relationship, e.g., by a distance matrix or a similarity matrix.
