The rule of law is the alternative to rule by caprice. A constitution is a statement of what "constitutes" the philosophy of the relationship between citizens and their government. Without the stability of laws that express that philosophical constitution, laws that will be honored over time and across the population, there is no predictability in how authorities will act. The functional aspect of "rule of law" is the principle of "equal protection under the law." A constitution is a voluntary surrendering of what I might be capable of doing (owning slaves, violating another's property!) Responsible government and parliamentary democracy are oriented towards the common good and make self-government possible. They form part of a shared constitutional tradition and their political foundation is the joint commitment of the people of the United Kingdom to be governed by way of these arrangements, which unite them in common action. The devolutionary settlements were introduced and have been extended in this way. It would also compromise the judicial capacity to contribute to the rule of law and would institute a mode of government that is not well-placed to secure the common good.
