The Central Park Jogger trials offer evidence of just how racially polarized Americans' attitudes toward our criminal justice system have become. The white media refused to publish the Central Park Jogger's name (Sullivan uses a pseudonym) but the black media did. A group of persons Sullivan calls the "Supporters" regularly crowded the courtroom. They wore shirts and carried signs proclaiming the defendants' innocence and hurled racial epithets at court officials, indicating their conviction that the white power structure was scapegoating the nonwhite defendants.
