NOTE FROM BRYCE DESSNER

I've been interested in Black Mountain College for many years. I went to summer camp in North Carolina as a kid just a few miles from the site of the college and actually learned to play music in those same mountains that spawned some of the greatest artists and art movements of the 20th century. I first learned about Black Mountain College through the well known and long-running John Cage and Merce Cunningham collaboration, which was in its early years at Black Mountain (both were teachers at the college). I learned more about the college later in reading about the many profoundly important visual artists who came through there either as teachers, visiting lecturers, or students (Robert Rauschenberg, Cy Twombly, Robert Motherwell, Willem de Kooning, Philip Guston, and Franz Kline, to name a few). But the decision to create a staged work for the Brooklyn Youth Chorus reflecting on Black Mountain was born out of a more recent exploration of the school of Black Mountain Poets. Poets like Robert Creeley and Charles Olson (also the last rector of the College) were hugely influential American writers and integral to the Black Mountain story. My original idea was to set poems by the Black Mountain Poets; this idea expanded to embrace the ethos of community and collaboration which was so essential to the college. The spirit of learning through doing and emphasis on self-exploration for both teachers and students seemed like a perfect vehicle to create a collaborative work that would be meaningful to both the young singers of the chorus, as well as the creative community of composers and artists who we embraced for the project.

Because the identity of Black Mountain was so diverse and creatively expansive, we allowed each composer and collaborator to explore the ideas and characters of the place on their own. In the spirit of the college we wanted this process to be inspiring for each composer and to reflect a process of individual self-discovery. The music was written over a three-year period and commissions were rolled out on different timelines, which allowed us to steer artists towards exploring different ideas and texts based on what others already covered. For instance, once we had a couple of Cage and Creeley inspired works, we suggested that other composers look elsewhere. In the end we touched only a fraction of the vast community of the college. The songs and narration woven throughout the show set texts or ideas from John Cage, Merce Cunningham, Josef and Anni Albers, Charles Olson, Robert Creeley, Buckminster Fuller, Robert Duncan, Fielding Dawson (including a song set in Franz Kline's studio), Ruth Asawa (who inspired the stage design), Basil King, and MC Richards. It is particularly rewarding that the piece premieres in the Harvey Theater, considering that Harvey Lichtenstein is a Black Mountain alumnus.

Our team has spent the last year immersed in Black Mountain research, visiting the former campus with its beautiful rolling hills, drawing inspiration from its community of hard-working artists. But, perhaps Fielding Dawson said it best: "All the interviewing of former students and faculty are but shallow reminders, dim reflections. It is too bad, and may seem unfair, but so Black Mountain was, and if you weren't there, you will never know, or understand. Unless you create it. That's the catch. If you never were there, you'll have to create it."

BROOKLYN YOUTH CHORUS

Now in its 23rd season, the Grammy Award-winning Brooklyn Youth Chorus, under the direction of Founder & Artistic Director Dianne Berkun-Menaker, is one of the country's leading youth choruses and the ensemble of choice for internationally renowned orchestras and artists, including the New York Philharmonic, London and Atlanta symphonies, Mariinsky Orchestra, Barbra Streisand, Elton John, Grizzly Bear, and Glen Hansard. The Chorus' television appearances include Late Night with David Letterman, Saturday Night Live, Late Show with Conan O'Brien, and on commercials for Taylor Made Gold Clubs and Santander Bank. The Chorus won a Grammy Award for the world premiere live recording of John Adams' On the Transmigration of Souls with the New York Philharmonic in 2005 and appears on Bryce Dessner and Kronos Quartet's 2013 release Aheym. The New York Times has hailed them as "remarkable young singers," and recently described the Chorus as "a consistently bold organization that regularly commissions works from composers representing an unusually broad stylistic range." The Chorus studies and performs a diverse repertoire and thrives on collaboration with composers and artists including Nico Muhly, Paola Prestini, and Kronos Quartet and Rinde Eckert. The Chorus serves more than 500 singers annually at its headquarters in Cobble Hill and locations in Bedford-Stuyvesant and Red Hook. Choristers, who range from seven to 20 years old, reflect the broad diversity of the metropolitan area. brooklynyouthchorus.org

Black Mountain College: An Interdisciplinary Approach is a visual arts exhibition comprising archival photographs by Hazel Larsen Archer and other paintings, drawings, and sculpture by notable Black Mountain College alumni. The show, which is on view in the Natman Room Patron Lounge in the Peter Jay Sharp Building and the Harvey Theater through January 4th, was organized in conjunction with the 2014 Next Wave Festival production of Black Mountain Songs, a live performance song cycle by the Brooklyn Youth Chorus that derives its inspiration from the collaborative and interdisciplinary nature of Black Mountain College.

Black Mountain College, a progressive liberal arts school in western North Carolina, was an experiment in education and artistic idealism, attracting some of the best and brightest American artists over the course of its 23 years (1933—56). With a focus on community living and unconventional structure, students were encouraged to work across a wide range of disciplines and genres. Hazel Larsen Archer, who became the first full-time photography teacher in 1949, studied with faculty member Josef Albers during a summer session in 1944, staying on to continue graduate work. During the summer of 1948 and for the next five years, she documented life at Black Mountain College while also pursuing her own experimental trajectory in photography. In particular, the summer of 1948 proved to be one of the most productive in the school's short history, hosting a number of now-iconic visionaries like John Cage, Merce Cunningham, Robert Rauschenberg, Buckminster Fuller, Willem and Elaine de Kooning, and Ray Johnson, among others. Archer was there to capture the creative synergy of this singular moment in American history, producing a stunning series of Cunningham in motion in addition to numerous portraits of students, faculty, and staff alike. On view here is a selection of these photographs, most of them original vintage prints, along with a sampling of work by notable Black Mountain College alumni. The subject matter of the images alone gives testament to the nature of interdisciplinary study at Black Mountain College, from Rauschenberg dancing to the light studies that Archer pursued, where she explored the boundaries of the medium of photography. In the main lobby of the Peter Jay Sharp building is a 1984 wool tapestry by Anni Albers, a textile designer, weaver, writer, and printmaker (and Josef's wife), who is widely recognized as a major force in the elevation of fabric as a fine art form in the 20th century.

Though Black Mountain College remains an indelible chapter in American art history, it also has a particular importance within BAM's story. Former BAM President/Executive Producer and cultural impresario Harvey Lichtenstein, who established the institution's renowned reputation between 1967—99, attended the summer session at Black Mountain College in 1953, where he met many of the collaborators he would later bring to BAM's stages.

Songs contain various forms, such as those including the repetition of sections. Through semantic widening, a broader sense of the word "song" may refer to instrumentals. Written words created specifically for music or for which music is specifically created, are called lyrics.
