Indeed, it is hard to perceive in what respect the interrogation of the perjurious client in a courtroom is not greater participation in the client's perjury than his interrogation in the office of his attorney. The author's footnoted "distinction" between active participation in a false defense and "accepting a client's decision to commit perjury, and presenting that perjury to the court," id. at 73 n.*, is so flimsy as to be intellectually invisible. 1976].
